In a typical Internet environment, for example, the information that is communicated is typically a packet of information, where the packet includes the information and an identifier for the source of the packet or the destination of the packet. Because of the ubiquitous nature of the Internet, reliable, continuous communication is often not an option. For example, a communication may be cut off without any notification of the user. The cut-off may occur, for example, if a computer hosting a packet stream crashes, or if a computer host does not receive a connection request from the destination computer. To avoid these cut-offs, some systems typically set up time-out mechanisms which measure the time interval between the last packet transmission and the next packet transmission and if the amount of time exceeds a certain number of seconds, for example, a few minutes, then the connection is considered to be over. These systems, however, are unreliable because the user may not know of the loss of the network connection. Another prior art system uses a packet sniffer to monitor network traffic and detect a loss of a network connection. The packet sniffer is a program or device that monitors network traffic and records information related to the packet traffic and identifies the sending and receiving end-points. The information that the packet sniffer records may be compared with information provided by a central network controller. In this manner, the central network controller identifies the loss of the network connection
