The application is basically running as a.net 2.0 application and it does a net.tcp binding to localhost:2137 (another application listens on this port) in order to communicate with it. I would like to use the windows host file to tell the server that it should use the default port on the localhost(for the net.tcp binding), but in this case it will try to connect to the other application. I would like it to try to connect to the sub-domain first. Is it possible? If not, will I be able to tell the server to use the other application using some kind of wildcard, like *.domain.com A: You can bind to wildcard subdomains and have more than one server listening. You can either do this in the hosts file or with DNS (in which case, you can have multiple entries under the subdomain wildcard). If you create a new binding to the same port in IIS, then it'll resolve your "localhost" to the subdomain address. Helloooo, my name's Michael and this is as good a time as any to contact you, if any you are there. I will be arriving in Chicago on May 19th and would love to run into a true couchsurfer that I can stay with so that I can ask you all of your questions about where to stay, where to eat, what to do, etc.
