Effects of beta-adrenergic blockade on sodium and water excretion in man. Two patients with primary amenorrhea received propranolol, a nonselective beta-adrenergic blocking agent, to investigate the effects of beta blockade on sodium and water excretion in a setting of physiologic challenge. One subject had aldosteronoma and the other had an iatrogenic cause for hyporeninemia. In both patients, beta blockade prevented the expected increases in blood pressure that accompany physiologic challenge, while urinary sodium excretion was unaffected. The observed changes in water excretion reflected natriuresis in both patients and normal subjects. These data indicate that in the absence of other known causes of hyporeninemia, beta blockade prevents the expected blood pressure rise and renal excretion of sodium in response to physiologic challenge, but fails to inhibit antinatriuresis and relative diuresis.
