Q: Create a GIF in a loop from a list of paths as input I have a list of paths containing shapes and want to create a GIF with those shapes overlaid. I started out wanting to use `pylab.imread` to read the list of paths and plot them using `graph`. I realise `imread` loops through the list at each run - I don't want that - I want to read the list once and then feed each of those paths to the next frame in the GIF. Does anyone know how this can be achieved? Or should I try another route. Many thanks

A: You can use `pygal` to create the gif and show images without calling a python loop.

import pygal
import pathlib
import pylab
from matplotlib import pyplot as plt my_paths =
pathlib.Path("path to images")
some_paths = my_paths.glob("images/*.png") some_paths.sort(key=lambda x: x.absolute()) img = pygal.Image(path=some_paths[0])
for i, path in enumerate(some_paths[1:]):
    img.add(pygal.Image(path=path))
img.scale(0.3)
img.add_text("image #" + str(i))
save the gif
pygal.write(filename="mygif.gif")

Correlates of HIV-1 subtype diversity in southwestern Nigeria. Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) has shaped human genetic diversity in central Africa. In southwestern Nigeria, an HIV epidemic has evolved with the distribution of HIV-1 subtypes from various exogenous introductions, predominantly from Kenya and South Africa. Nigeria, we conducted a molecular analysis of the env gp41 region of 173 HIV-1-infected individuals. Eight of nine possible subtypes were identified. In this study, subtypes A and D were the dominant subtypes, accounting for 43% of the total study group. Subtypes B, C, E and AG were less common. The principal component analysis differentiated between recombinant forms, which were found in 60% of our study group, and the predominant subtype D. Of the recombinants, 43% were subtype D/A, 26% were subtype D/F/G/H/C and 10% were subtype D/F/G. In close proximity to the origin of the epidemic, we detected 5% subtype A/G recombinants. A difference was observed in transmission risk between the more frequent subtype A and less common subtypes. The high frequency of subtypes A and D in southwestern Nigeria emphasizes the importance of controlling HIV-1 transmission from specific population groups.

Q: How can I run a command when Raspberry Pi boots? I want to be able to print a string to the screen when Raspberry Pi boots up (without being used as a cron daemon). Is there a good way to do this? A: You are looking for a machine startup file: /etc/init.d/rc.local This script is called when booting up. You can use either `systemctl start rc.local` or `service rc.local start` to start the file and it will run after boot.

A: I want to be able to print a string to the screen when Raspberry Pi boots

The simplest way to do this is using the boot-completion project. (Fedora) `sudo easy_install boot-completion` The script is pre-installed in `/usr/libexec/boot-completion.d/70-bash` `#!/usr/bin`
