Surgical site infections (SSIs) are common complications in patients receiving peripheral nerve blocks (PNBs), with coverage of the incisional site recommended. While single-incision closure (SIC) has been demonstrated to be effective, there have been no studies investigating SIC in patients receiving PNBs. To review the safety and efficacy of SIC in patients receiving PNBs. A systematic search of the PubMed database was performed of English-language articles published from the time of the database inception (2005) to October 2016, with no limitations for the type of PNB. Only patients receiving a PNB for analgesia were included. Case reports, case series, and observational studies were included. Twenty-one manuscripts were found that met the inclusion criteria. No studies reported complete wound healing, and only one study reported a single SSI related to a PNB. The PNB type was described in 11 studies, but most studies (n = 11) did not provide a description of the PNB. In these studies, the PNB was typically conducted using the nerve stimulator technique (n = 6) or using a nerve stimulator and a nerve blockade/superficial injection technique (n = 7). In three studies, the PNB was conducted using ultrasound guidance, a nerve stimulator
