Anaemia is one of the most common causes of poor pregnancy outcomes in developing countries. In response, Ethiopia has implemented different national programs such as the Mother Initiative, Haematinics and the Women's Initiative programs to tackle anaemia during pregnancy. However, there is limited information on the prevalence of anaemia and its related factors in the South Nations, Nationalities and Peoples Region, Ethiopia. This study assessed the prevalence of anaemia among pregnant women in Gurage zone and its associated factors. A community based cross-sectional study was conducted from March to May 2011 in Gurage zone, Southern Nations, Nationalities and Peoples Region, Ethiopia. Sample size was determined by using a single population proportion formula. Multivariate logistic regression was employed to determine factors associated with anaemia in the study area. Pregnant women who were taken during antenatal care and who consented to participate were included. A total of 479 pregnant women were interviewed. The prevalence of anaemia was 80.2%.

Multivariate logistic regression analysis revealed that age of the respondent, total number of live births and current pregnancy were found to be significantly associated with anaemia. This study demonstrated a high prevalence of anaemia among pregnant women attending antenatal care in the study area. It is recommended that government and non-governmental organizations have to work closely to minimize anaemia among pregnant women.
